Self-concordant family-centered medical education for pediatricians: a prospective study. Self-concordant family-centered medical education is well recognized as a distinctive paradigm of undergraduate medical education. This article describes the results of a study in which a self-concordant pediatrics curriculum was integrated into the curriculum of one medical school's undergraduate pediatrics program. The curriculum was introduced as an option to all students who had completed the first year of the program. Satisfaction with the curriculum was assessed at the end of the introductory course and at each of the four subsequent semesters. Based on the qualitative data, a quantitative evaluation was conducted at the end of the introductory course and one of the subsequent semesters to determine the satisfaction of the students with the educational content and learning environment of the course. In qualitative interviews, students reported that the self-concordant format helped them to engage in the course and encouraged them to think about their role as a physician. Students' satisfaction with the curricular content remained high over the 4 years of the study. The results of the quantitative evaluation showed that students were satisfied with the educational content and learning environment. Self-concordant curricula are an acceptable alternative to traditional curriculum formats. Students were able to obtain the core knowledge of pediatrics and to become familiar with the content of self-concordant curricula. The results from this study and from those of previous studies support the use of self-concordant curricula for undergraduate medical education.
